

The Rt. Hon. Lord Neuberger
President of The Supreme Court of the United Kingdom

“I am very pleased to express my support to the work of City Disabilities. The professions, and indeed all areas of commercial and civic life, have a duty to encourage and nurture talented people with disabilities. This is not only the right thing to do in terms of respecting human dignity: it also makes sound business sense to recruit and support the very best people.

“In the Supreme Court's main courtroom hangs a prominent portrait of Sir John Fielding - the man credited with, among other things, formalising the first criminal records system in the country. He had been blinded at the age of 19. Fielding's presence is a continual reminder to myself and my colleagues that not only should Justice be blind to characteristics, but also that a legal profession and judiciary which embraces the breadth of diversity of society will ultimately serve that society more fully and justly.

“I wish you all the best as you help your chosen field of work to do likewise.”
